What would make sense in the utopian world where your background, income or status didn't matter? What would architecture-free from economical, political and geographical coordinates be like? And what would be our role in this utopia?

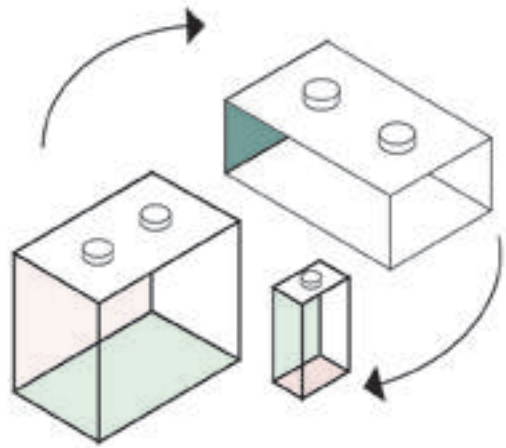

Despite of all material things, one is clear - true emotions are all that matter. Modernism pioneer, american architect's Louis Sullivan's iconic saying about form that follows function now has been adapted into the statement that form follows fun. Just play! Have fun! Entertain yourself!

In architect's hands is to give a frame for living and people should fill it and adapt it for their needs. So participation in process of making your own space is the value of architecture nowadays. Play with your values and dreams and make them visible of creating your space as one you would love to live in. Enjoy architecture and process as well as the result, because as Pink Floyd sings, "all in all it's just another brick in the wall".
