

The house is the place where we return, a landmark in our world, a shelter. It is part of human being's condition to protect himself from his hostile environment: nature and society. Children respond instinctively to this primitive need by constructing their own worlds with blankets and pillows. Not looking for any effects, they build their place with a natural simplicity and an innocent understanding of architecture. They create their very own universe, the right space - the naive hut. If the house is the place where you sleep and rest, it is also the place of thought and meditation. Our posture is to consider the house as the path from the physical world of the society to the metaphysical world of thought. The tent is a space of possibilities, without any defined scale other than the one you want to confer - a heterotopia.
