

Where do we put windows if we don't have any context? Normal becomes ridiculous and we need to forget everything. Imagine a place without stimulus, a pure neutral space with floating people. Where do these complex and needy humans go to sleep? Where and what do they eat? How do we exist there? What if man was able to grow a material around itself with the purpose of shelter, nutrition and comfort. These apparitions would grow differently according to each individual's needs and they would evolve with them. After recharging people would leave the constructs behind which would eventually dissolve into nothing. All together would form a new sporadic and dynamic architecture purely based on instinct and needs. We don't know what these spaces look like or how they interact. With perpetual new formations and active dissolving ones, there would be a constant observable evolution. To express these formations we used simple geometric shapes as symbols for these embryonic constructs.

Perspective from inside of construct

Team 2107

Plan and section - the same in abstract space.

Team 2107